Sunni and Shia Islam: Historical Context to Modern Conflict

Prepared by Emily Hawley, Research Associate

After the death of the Prophet Mohammad in 632 CE, the Muslim community diverged over how to select the next leader of the Islamic community they had formed on the Arabian Peninsula. One group supported succession by Ali, the Prophet Mohammad's closest male family member. Many of these believers would become modern day Shia Muslims. Others supported the Muslim congregation's ability to elect their next leader from the Prophet's devout inner circle, of which Ali was a member. They would become Sunni Muslims who comprise 80 percent of Islam's 1.6 billion followers today.

A community at a crossroads

Although Sunni and Shia accounts differ on the precise events following the Prophet's death, both concur that proponents of collective selection won the initial succession debate. Three communally selected leaders, had already served before Ali was chosen. His appointment stirred further controversy; Ali faced powerful opponents including the late Prophet's wife, Aisha, and relatives of the recently murdered leader, Uthman. Although Ali survived these initial challenges to his power, he was assassinated in 661 by a small religious sect named the Kharijites. Almost two decades later, Ali's son Hussein stood up against the new leadership in defiance of dynastic appointments. He and 72 followers and family members lost their lives, although his infant son survived to carry on the family lineage.¹

Despite this political rift, distinction between Sunnis and Shias was only formalised in the early 16th century. The declaration was based in another political rivalry between the would-be Shia Saffavids and the future Sunni Ottomans.

Nuances in belief

Today, both Sunnis and Shias mourn the loss of Hussein and Ali. For Sunnis, Ali's death marked the end of a golden period in Islam. Shias, for whom Ali was the only rightful leader of those selected after the Prophet's death, place more emphasis on the loss and martyrdom of Hussein. However both commemorate Hussein's last battle each Islamic year on the holiday Ashura. Heavily circulated images of Shia self-flagellation on this day highlight a practice subject to debate within the Shia community. Another Shia commemoration practice gains less coverage;

Iran's blood banks collect almost four times their average donations on the day of Ashura.²

Unlike Sunnis, Shias believe in an infallible religious leader called the Imam. Originally, these Imams descended directly from Ali until the 12th Imam disappeared as a young child in 939. Al-Jafaris or "Twelvers," a recent moniker for the predominant Shia group today, place immense importance on this missing Imam. They consider him to be the Mahdi, a powerful Islamic figure who will appear at the end of time alongside Jesus Christ. Although Sunnis and other Shia orders believe in the coming of the Mahdi, only the Twelvers believe he is the missing Imam and await his return. After the loss of the 12th Imam, succession of Shia leadership transitioned to a process more similar to that of Sunnis. Religious leaders serve as an executive official with a special responsibility towards the implementation of Islamic law. For Sunnis, there has never been a formal clergy; instead scholars and jurists write nonbinding expert opinions.

The eminence of Shia Imams spurs some Sunnis to question Shias' adherence to the idea of oneness of God that is essential to Islam. Nonetheless, leading Sunni scholars, including Sheikh Mahmood Shaltoot of Cairo's Al Azhar University, have recognized major Shia sects as legitimate denominations,³ as does King Abdullah II's Amman Message. For these scholars, differences rooted in political divide cannot counteract their shared Quranic values and the centrality of this holy text to both as fellow Muslims.

Development of Modern Tension

Sunnis and Shias live peacefully throughout much of the Muslim world; in some countries, they may intermarry and pray at the same mosques. Historically, conflict in the Muslim world has also not fallen along Sunni-Shia lines.⁴ Even organisations like al-Qaeda and Hezbollah focus on anti-Western/Zionist frameworks rather than divides within Islam.⁵

By the same token, it is inaccurate to portray either all Shias or all Sunnis as a single political entity. To the contrary, in the 1980s Iraq's Sunni President Saddam Hussein led a majority Shia army against a Shia State in the Iran-Iraq War. Likewise, Saudi Arabia, in conjunction with attempts to strengthen its branch of Sunni Islam, has denounced other Sunni powers like the Muslim Brotherhood.⁶ For many Muslims, political, ethnic, national and familial loyalties take precedence to questions of Sunni or Shia.⁷

Religious sectarianism, however, is on the rise in the West Asia-North Africa region, and conflicts in Iraq and Syria are increasingly drawn along confessional lines. In Iraq and Syria, Shia powers fight off largely Sunni opposition. These tensions have clear geopolitical origins. Since Iran's 1979

Islamic Revolution, Sunni Saudi Arabia and Shia Iran have raced to increase their regional sway, largely by promoting alliances along sectarian lines. Some analysts consider modern day Syrian and Iraqi battlefields a proxy war for these two nations.⁸

Reducing the Syrian civil war or the rise of the so-called Islamic State (ISIS) to Sunni-Shia conflict is a dangerous oversimplification. Characterising the violence in sectarian terms risks becoming a self-fulfilling prophecy. Former Iraqi Prime Minister al-Maliki learned this lesson when his sectarian statements ruined his chance to capitalise on Sunni opposition to ISIS in December 2013.⁹ Opposition to ISIS, in particular, challenges the Sunni-Shia dichotomy, for Saudi Arabia and Iran share antagonism towards the self-proclaimed Sunni state.
